Lebanon-born
Community Information Summary

Historical Background

There have been three main waves of Lebanese migration to Australia: from around 1880 to 1947; from 1947 to 1975; and after 1975. The first Lebanese migrant landed in Australia in 1876. At that time the area now known as Lebanon was a province of the Ottoman Empire. The Australian colonial governments of the time classified them as Turks.

By 1947, the Lebanon-born and Syria-born populations in Australia numbered 1886. The great majority were Maronite, Melkite and Orthodox Christians. A small number of Druze settled in South Australia.

The years 1947-1961 accounted for a net increase in the Lebanon-born in Australia of about 400 per year, followed by about 800 per year during 1961-1966. The 1967 Arab-Israeli War and general uncertainty in the region caused the net intake to increase to 3000 per year during 1966-1971 before dropping down to 2200 per year until 1976.

As a result of the sharp rise in Lebanese migration, the Lebanon-born community in Australia increased from 10,688 persons in 1966 to 33,424 in 1976. The outbreak of civil war in Lebanon in late 1975 resulted in the third wave of Lebanese migration to Australia, with the Australian Government easing entry restrictions to allow Lebanese already in Australia to sponsor their family members.
